

Boston's Fort Point Project Management Merges with Cumming

April 9, 2021

Making the official announcement today, Boston-based Fort Point Project Management has merged with Cumming to expand its life sciences capabilities nationwide. By adding one of Boston's leading independent project management firms, Cumming will be able to continue to expand its Northeast presence with Fort Point's unmatched local construction expertise and provide clients on a national level with the firm's dedicated sector experts.

A specialized, mid-sized firm of nearly 20 team members, Fort Point Project Management primarily focuses on the life sciences, office, and healthcare sectors, leading projects ranging from utilization studies and integrated workplace management software implementation to tenant improvement initiatives, and complex ground-up construction.

"We have seen tremendous growth opportunities in Boston and throughout the Greater New England region in a number of sectors, but especially within the life sciences industry," said Derek Hutchison, president at Cumming. "Venture capital funding for the industry is at record highs. Government bodies and major universities across the country are reaching out for guidance as they look to embark on these complex programming, design, and construction assignments in the life sciences sector."

Founded in 2000, Fort Point Project Management is led by Christine Mosholder and Steve Fox, with a longstanding and diverse client base including Beam Therapeutics, EMD Serono, and Amundi, a leading European asset manager, among many other industry leading organizations.

Hutchison added, "We could not be more excited to welcome Fort Point's unparalleled team into our international family as they have a proven track record of managing these unique builds to support rapidly expanding client needs."

The project management firm will continue to operate under the day-to-day leadership of its current executive team during its structured merger with Cumming's existing East Coast teams.

Link to original press release:

<https://ccorpusa.com/bostons-fort-point-project-management-merges-with-cumming/>