

ERM acquires climate, energy and water advisor Coho

February 14, 2023

ERM, the world's largest pure play sustainability consultancy, has acquired Coho, a global advisory firm with deep expertise in helping organizations reach their climate change, renewable energy and water resiliency goals.

The services offered by Coho's team of experts include market insights, strategy development and change management to reduce direct emissions; procure renewable energy; achieve electric vehicle transition, fuel switching, and supply chain improvements; and capture fundamental enhancements in water resiliency.

Combined with ERM's strategic transformation and technical delivery capabilities, the acquisition will provide clients with further support to deliver their climate goals and realize the commercial opportunities presented by decarbonization and water optimization.

Susan Angyal, Regional Chief Executive Officer for North America at ERM, said: "At a time when commitments such as the Inflation Reduction Act present a historic opportunity to build a new clean energy economy, we are delighted to welcome Coho's specialist climate, renewable energy and water consulting expertise to ERM. We're looking forward to working with the team to develop and implement customizable and cost-effective solutions aimed at helping our clients to achieve their sustainability goals."

Gary Farha, Founder and CEO at Coho, said: "At this pivotal point in our evolution, we are looking forward to accelerating our impact on the market and climate. Through joining ERM we are expanding the reach of our services globally, to both new and existing clients. This is an exciting time for our team to further develop, personally and professionally, by joining the market leader in the business of sustainability."
